Adjusted Limits

The Internal Revenue Service has announced the 2012 limits that affect the operation of tax-qualified retirement plans, including 401(k) plans, and certain other types of employee benefit plans, including deferred compensation plans that may be subject to Internal Revenue Code §409A. The amount by which the limits are adjusted each year is based on a cost of living index. Please see the accompanying table for the limits that are effective January 1, 2012.

Social Security

The Social Security (OASDI) taxable wage base, which governs the amount of pay subject to Social Security tax withholding and affects plans that are "integrated" with Social Security, also is subject to adjustment annually. For 2012, the OASDI taxable wage base has been increased to $110,100. The Medicare tax, however, applies to all wages without limit.

NOTES

1 Note that the limit on benefits payable to a defined benefit plan participant for a particular year is the lesser of (i) the Annual Benefit Limit for Defined Benefit Plans for that year and (ii) 100% of the participant's average compensation for his high three years For 2012, the Annual Benefit Limit for such participant is $200,000. However, such participant's "average compensation" limit is adjusted due to the variance in the cost of living indexes over the past few years. For a participant who separated from service before 2010, the "average compensation" limit for 2012 is computed by multiplying the participant's 2011 "average compensation" limit for 2012 is computed by multiplying the participant's 2011, the "average compensation" limit for 2012 is computed by multiplying the participant's 2011 "average compensation" limit by 1.0376.
