Stephane concentrates his practice on representing emerging growth technology and life sciences companies and their investors on a variety of transactions, including entity formation, seed investments, venture capital financings, tender offers (including founder and investor partial liquidity transactions), M&A, and initial public offerings. He also regularly lectures on the legal aspects affecting emerging companies and venture capital funds, including as an adjunct professor at Cornell Law School.

In addition to teaching law students, Stephane has held lectures for practicing lawyers, and he often presents to entrepreneurs and venture capitalists on various topics related to the tech ecosystem in and around New York City.
