Miranda represents clients facing high-stakes disputes, including various complex commercial litigation and antitrust issues, as well as internal investigations. She has served clients in industries across media and entertainment, technology, and life sciences, advising them on litigation and business strategy at various stages, from prelitigation analysis through trial.

Miranda's representative matters include:

- Representing former shareholders of an antibody drug company in a suit against an acquiring public company for failure to make milestone payments
- Representing former directors in a shareholder class action challenging acquisition in the Delaware Court of Chancery
- Representing a major cryptocurrency platform in navigating threats of mass arbitration
- Representing a major video game developer in a complex civil antitrust matter alleging tying and monopolization from complaint stage through a 16-day trial in the US District Court for the Northern District of California*
- Conducting an internal investigation and preparing a presentation defending a major sports franchise in an investigation regarding alleged violation of league rules*
- Conducting an internal investigation for a large media conglomerate regarding allegations of a hostile and unprofessional workplace*

Representation handled before joining Cooley*

Miranda served as a law clerk to Chief Judge Richard Seeborg of the Northern District of California and Judge Stephen A. Higginson of the US Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

In law school, Miranda was a Forum and features editor for the Yale Law Journal, a student director for the Supreme Court Advocacy Clinic, and a Coker Fellow. She also served as a board member for Yale Law Women and APALSA, a research assistant to Supreme Court of California Justice Goodwin Liu, and a teaching assistant in torts.

Before law school, Miranda worked as a management consultant at Deloitte Consulting and a research fellow at PILnet in Beijing.
