

IRS Announces Adjusted Plan Limits for 2022

November 12, 2021

The Internal Revenue Service has announced cost-of-living-adjusted limits for 2022 that affect the operation of tax-qualified retirement plans, including 401(k) plans, and certain other types of employee benefit plans, including deferred compensation plans that may be subject to Internal Revenue Code §409A. The amount by which the limits are adjusted each year is based on a cost-of-living index. Not all limits increase every year. In connection with the increased limits for 2022, employers should revise participant communications and election forms, amend plan documents and summary plan descriptions, and update all payroll and/or human resource systems with the new dollar amount limitations.

The Social Security (OASDI) taxable wage base, which governs the amount of pay subject to Social Security tax withholding and affects plans that are “integrated” with Social Security, also is subject to adjustment annually. For 2022, the OASDI taxable wage base has been increased to $147,000.
