Tristan counsels the world's leading technology companies on their most complex digital regulation challenges.

He has deep technical knowledge of foundational frameworks, like the European Union's Artificial Intelligence (AI) Act and Digital Services Act and the UK's Online Safety Act. Leveraging his visibility into the policy shaping digital law on both sides of the Atlantic, Tristan provides strategic advice on novel products, enterprise risk management, and international regulatory engagement and defence.

Before private practice, Tristan served as a senior lawyer for the Australian government, where he advised the national security community at the intersection of technology, free speech and surveillance. He has extensive litigation experience in high-stakes national security cases.
