

Cooley

May 2, 2011

Last Wednesday, the United States Supreme Court held in AT&T Mobility LLC vs. Concepcion that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") permits companies to require customers to arbitrate their complaints individually, precluding class action claims.

Specifically, the Court held that the FAA prohibits state laws that condition the enforceability of certain arbitration agreements on the availability of classwide arbitration procedures. Consequently, companies can now require consumers to arbitrate any and all disputes and prevent the disputes from being decided on a classwide basis in arbitration.

The arbitration agreement at issue in the AT&T case was contained in a contract for cell phone services between AT&T and two customers (the Concepcions). Among other things, the agreement provided for arbitration of all disputes between the parties, but required that claims be brought in the parties' "individual capacity, and not as a plaintiff or class member in any purported class or representative proceeding." The Concepcions sued AT&T in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, and their complaint was consolidated with a putative class action alleging false advertising. AT&T moved to compel arbitration of the Concepcions' claims, but both the District Court, and the Ninth Circuit in a subsequent appeal from the District Court's decision, relied on the California Supreme Court's decision in Discover Bank v. Superior Court, 36 Cal. 4th 148 (2005), to conclude that the arbitration provision was unconscionable because it prohibited class proceedings.

The Supreme Court reversed. Emphasizing the "liberal federal policy favoring arbitration," the Court concluded that California's Discover Bank rule, which classified most class or collective arbitration waivers in consumer contracts as unconscionable, "stands as an obstacle" to the objectives of the FAA, and is therefore preempted.

In the wake of this decision, many companies are considering adding similar arbitration provisions to their customer agreements and employment contracts. For certain companies, these provisions may be beneficial. There are, however, a number of issues a company should consider before deciding to add such a provision, including:

- Would it actually benefit a company to face potentially numerous individual arbitrations (which may require the company to pay costs and attorneys' fees) in various locations around the United States rather than fewer class action lawsuits?
- Does the company want to draft the provision to include all types of claims in an arbitration provision, or only certain types?
- How should the arbitration provision be drafted to avoid being considered unenforceable for alternative reasons?
- How does a company effectively modify existing customer agreements, online terms and conditions of use, and other consumer contracts to include such a provision?

In other words, while provisions similar to that in AT&T might be beneficial to some companies, one size does not fit all and companies should consult legal counsel to determine whether and what type of arbitration provision is in their best interests.

Cooley LLP has considerable experience not only in successfully compelling arbitration based on binding agreements—having secured victories in both the United States and California Supreme Courts upholding arbitration of claims originally initiated as class action lawsuits—but also has extensive experience in drafting enforceable arbitration agreements. If you have any questions about arbitration clauses or this Alert, please contact one of the attorneys listed above.

This content is provided for general informational purposes only, and your access or use of the content does not create an attorney-client relationship between you or your organization and Cooley LLP, Cooley (UK) LLP, or any other affiliated practice or entity (collectively referred to as "Cooley"). By accessing this content, you agree that the information provided does not constitute legal or other professional advice. This content is not a substitute for obtaining legal advice from a qualified attorney licensed in your jurisdiction, and you should not act or refrain from acting based on this content. This content may be changed without notice. It is not guaranteed to be complete, correct or up to date, and it may not reflect the most current legal developments. Prior results do not guarantee a similar outcome. Do not send any confidential information to Cooley, as we do not have any duty to keep any information you provide to us confidential. When advising companies, our attorney-client relationship is with the company, not with any individual. This content may have been generated with the assistance of artificial intelligence (AI) in accordance with our AI Principles, may be considered Attorney Advertising and is subject to our legal notices.

Key Contacts

Michelle Doolin San Diego	mdoolin@cooley.com +1 858 550 6043
Whitty Somvichian San Francisco	wsomvichian@cooley.com +1 415 693 2061
Mazda Antia San Diego	mantia@cooley.com +1 858 550 6139

This information is a general description of the law; it is not intended to provide specific legal advice nor is it intended to create an attorney-client relationship with Cooley LLP. Before taking any action on this information you should seek professional counsel.

Copyright © 2023 Cooley LLP, 3175 Hanover Street, Palo Alto, CA 94304; Cooley (UK) LLP, 22 Bishopsgate, London, UK EC2N 4BQ. Permission is granted to make and redistribute, without charge, copies of this entire document provided that such copies are complete and unaltered and identify Cooley LLP as the author. All other rights reserved.