Commercial Litigation

Julia focuses on class-action defense and internet privacy litigation and has experience defending mass arbitrations. She maintains an active pro bono practice spanning national and local issues, including projects related to voting rights and housing justice.

In law school, Julia focused on the intersection of technology and law, specifically critical contemporary issues such as platform regulation and data privacy. She served as an editor of the Stanford Law Review and Stanford Law Review Online, held a leadership position with the Asian and Pacific Islander Law Students Association, and expanded on prior work related to educational equity, representing disadvantaged students through the Mills Legal Clinic's Youth and Education Law Project.
